Accra's Hot Salsa

Of all the things you thought you would learn while living in Ghana, salsa dancing (usually associated with Cuba) probably isn't one of them. However, a salsa dancing wave has been sweeping through Accra's nightlife over the last two years, making salsa a fun and accessible activity. Over the last few years, salsa dancing has been available at several other venues in Accra. Some nightclubs occasionally feature salsa nights. Pippa's Health Center recently offered salsa lessons. There are several theories about why salsa dancing is so popular in Accra. Bridgette Dzogbenuku, general manager of the Aviation Social Center, thinks it's part of the global Latin music fad over the last few years. Salsa instructor Samuel Gcapong thinks it's because salsa dancing is an alternative to the hip hop music scene. He also says it's popular among people who like exercise but want something more interesting than a treadmill. (After you break a sweat dancing, you can wet your whistle at Aviation Center's bar.) Cynthia noted that the salsa scene at Aviation Center is unique in Accra, offering an evening activity that you won't find anywhere else.

Samuel is one of several salsa teachers who teach in Accra. He says he learned salsa dancing about four years ago at a club called Costa Rica. When the teacher there left Ghana, he stepped in to take over. He has been teaching salsa for about two years. By day, when he's not teaching salsa dancing, Samuel is a medical doctor. Ghana might not actually be an odd place to learn salsa dancing. Although salsa developed in Cuba, grew from the fusion of Spanish guitar and West African drumming rhythms. In that respect, Ghana could be considered the ancestral home of salsa, making it a very fine place to learn to dance.

Apart from salsa, the Aviation Social Center also has African dance class lessons. Call them for their list of dance classes and enjoy the fun! Source: Updated from June 2003 Okyeame.

One topic all the flowery books written about Provence depict quite accurately is the famous food and flower markets. Here you will find everything from exotic mushrooms to magnificent blooms to hundreds of olive oils ... but my favorite part is all of the vendors calling me over with "Mademoiselle! Mademoiselle!" This is music to my ears, as I am an American divorcée in my forties (having moved here ten years ago for what is now my ex-husband), and "Mademoiselle" is a term for young girls. I take this as affirmation of my youth - and the fact that the dermatologist I am using for wrinkle filler injections is worth every euro. But just to be sure, I decided one day to find out how the vendors addressed other women I assessed to be past the "Mademoiselle" years. Perhaps it was simply a sales technique? So although I was leaving myself open to the notorious pickpockets known to frequent the Saturday market, I decided to make it my mission to see if other women got the same banter. Did they get called "Mademoiselle"? Were they given free flowers if they bought a small bunch? Were they told how pretty they were? I decided the best way to do this was to plant myself in front of one of the fruit and vegetable stands, where I could pick up, squeeze and pretend to be assessing various fruits and vegetables and no one would get suspicious.

I couldn't do this, for example, at the honey stand, because there are only so many products, and they would probably have me arrested or at the very least dragged off to the local psychiatric hospital for observation if I started picking up all the different honey-themed jars and soaps and started squeezing them. Ready to begin, I headed over to the fruit section where there was space in front of the cherry bin between an elderly woman and a teenage girl and her boyfriend. The vendor was occupied explaining the superior origins of his aubergines to a small group of Dutch tourists, so I busied myself by picking up a cherry and starting to study it with the seriousness of a Place Vendôme Jeweler appraising a diamond. Color? Check! Texture? Check! Size? Could be bigger, but seeing as there were at least several hundred cherries in the bin I had yet to get to, I wasn't going to be judgmental - perhaps it was the runt of the litter. I tossed the rejected cherry back into the bin, ready to move on to the others. "Mademoiselle! Comment allez-vous?" a warm voice boomed. Just as I was about to respond, I looked up to see the vendor gallantly placing a kiss on each cheek of the elderly woman next to me, who was beaming with delight. Mademoiselle??? She had to be at least 90!! As she slowly accepted her bag of peaches and left, still glowing, I realized I was probably next. "Can I help you, Madame?" he barked in a less-than-friendly voice. Madame????????? How can he possibly call me "Madame" after calling a woman her age "Mademoiselle"?

On top of this, he sounded highly annoyed - but he should have been grateful I was taking his cherries so seriously; after all, there are other fruit and vegetable stands, and I was clearly displaying all the marks of a connoisseur. Hoping my tone of voice conveyed the fact that I might move on to a competing vendor if he addressed me so rudely again, I curtly told him I was just looking. He curtly told me to stop handling the merchandise. At this point I was a bit confused. Surely I was not the only person examining the produce. They should be used to this by now. As a matter of fact, looking around, I saw other women doing exactly the same thing ... so what was setting me apart? It was then that it hit me: THEY ALL HAVE WHEELY CARTS! I had only my Chanel handbag, clearly the mark of a non-serious shopper. I had two choices at this point: I could leave immediately and come back next week with a wheely cart, or I could look pointedly at someone with a wheely cart, shake my head in disapproval and make some disdainful remark about preferring to carry all my purchases by hand, as I unlike many others here choose to stay in shape by combining exercise with shopping.

GARDENING: You too can Grow an Italian Herb Garden. Part I

Italy is said to have some of the best cuisine in the world and, at the heart of that cuisine are their famous herbs. Growing your own organic Italian herb garden is sure to be rewarding and delicious. Whether indoors or outdoors, as additions to your vegetable garden or on their own, Italian herbs are a delight to both grow and eat.

You may already be familiar with a number of Italian herbs. There is a good chance that you have some Italian herbs growing in your garden and an even better chance that there are some in your kitchen. Basil, fennel, rosemary, oregano, and parsley are all household names in Italy and around the world.

How to Plant and Grow Fresh Basil

Basil may be the most well known Italian herb. Basil is an annual warm-season herb that is sensitive to cold weather. While you may be familiar with dried basil, enthusiasts will tell you that nothing compares to a few fresh basil leaves. Basil is relatively easy to grow and makes a great addition to your vegetable garden. Grow basil next to your peppers or tomatoes, basil is said to improve the flavour of its neighbouring plants. Basil is also said to repel flies and mosquitoes!

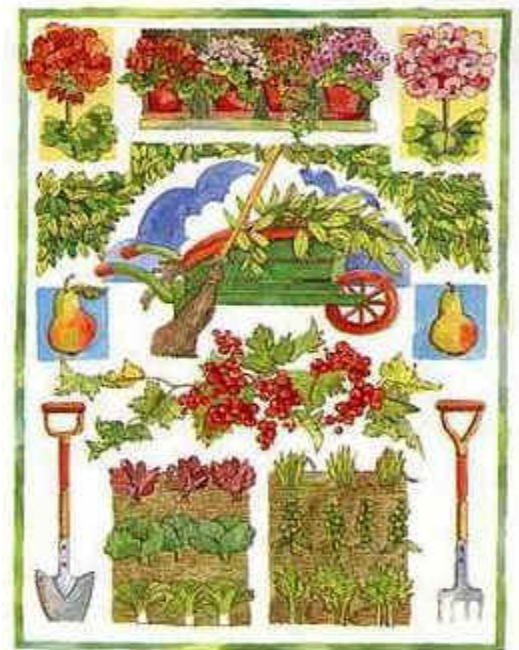

When planting basil, pick a site with full sun. Basil prefers warm to hot weather and a pH of 5.5-7.0. Basil can be planted in pots as well as directly in the ground; requires low watering and should be propagated by seed. Basil's most common enemies are the Japanese beetle, slugs and snails. Start seeds inside and transplant when a few inches tall.

To avoid an infestation of slugs and snails, line your garden with copper strips or wire mesh. The charge that builds up on the copper surface, repels both pests away from your garden as they are unable to move across it.

Basil must be pinched back as it begins to flower as once it flowers it loses flavour. Pruning back the flowers will also encourage it to grow bushier. Leaves should be cut in the morning after the dew has dried. Do not wash basil leaves, as they will lose their flavour.

NOTE: The next following weeks, we will feature herbs such as fennel, parsley, oregano, and rosemary to help complete your herb garden.
